Three Years Completed

With this issue, the International Journal of Prosthodontics and Restorative Dentistry (IJPRD) completes 3 years. We began this period with a feeling of accomplishment and optimism. The journal was started with the objective of disseminating information on new developments in research and production devoted to the improvement of oral rehabilitation.

The scope of this journal has been greater than we have been accustomed to seeing in the service of oral habilitation. We have observed an increasing awareness on the part of some of our readers of these important relationships among the scientific fields included in the areas of oral rehabilitation. The reception of this journal by our readers has been gratifying. From a beginning circulation which exceeded our most optimistic predictions, subscriptions have increased strongly and continue to do so. The influx of scientific papers to be considered for publication has shown a gratifying increase which indicates that this journal is an accepted medium for the dissemination of scientific research information in our specialty.

I thank our professional friends for enhancing the quality of IJOPRD by submitting quality manuscripts, which has benefited our readers.

This year, we are planning to have reviewers meeting, and also various other scientific activities for the benefit of our professional colleagues.

Continue research and reading ...
